Excerpt: . . . the angles at the point where they cut equal four right angles. Take the small triangle E C D. The angles at C and D are each 45 (half the right angles at the corners of the square), then if it is true that the three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles, the angle at E must be a right angle (for we have taken from the triangle the two angles C and D, each of 45, and together 90 or one right angle, and so the one left must be the other), and we might take in turn each of the four small triangles in the same way, and thus should find at the point E, four right angles, as stated. It will thus appear that it is easy in many cases to draw two lines at a desired...
