Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: .going to church to-morrow will be so frightened they will jump half over the moon, cried Nelly, laughing and clapping her hands. Just fancy Squire Dusenberry, said Flora; this is the way he will look at it; and she opened her eyes till they seemed ready to pop out, and stretched her mouth very nearly from ear to ear; and then all three laughed and jumped and wished it was dark, so that they might begin painting the boggy right away. Oh, oh! what naughty children! Squire Dusenberry had done WTong, certainly, but two wrongs never did make a right, and never will. Nelly by this time had quite forgotten her good resolutions, and waited impatiently with the other two. They could hardly eat enough tea, they were in such a hurry, and ran all the way to the little store in the village, where for some coppers Charley got the old tin mug the cook had given them half full of such bright red paint, that one look at it would have made a bull as mad as forty March hares. Soon after the sun set behind the hills, the gorgeous red and purple faded out of the clouds, and Madam Twilight softly laid her gray mantle upon the earth. Mr Rivers sat with his wife in the cosy little porch at the back of the parsonage, admiring the peaceful scene, and talking lovingly about Nelly, --how good she had been lately, and how she...
