He sets forth in a simple, direct way most of the economic and human factors which are employed in the production and distribution of the commodity coal. His analysis reveals the factors, both essential and non-essential at present which have their being in the industry. Broadly speaking, the essential factors are those described as the Raw Material Coal, and the labour of considerably over a million workpeople, both manual and mental, who contribute to the removal of the coal from its position in the earth to the consumer. There is no other general classification, than the foregoing possible, when describing the essential factors. Such factors as capital, both fixed and variable, are provided in the last analysis by the factor of labour, both manual and...
